Light, Water & Renewal

I like how much this little garden says without a word. There’s a lamp, a well, a stream, and something new pushing through the soil. All of it needs a little care.

Here’s an imagined story to go with it.

A traveler arrives at a dry garden carrying seven books. He opens them one by one, hoping to find the answer.

“Which one will bring this garden to life?” he asks.

The gardener hands him a lamp, a bucket, and a seed.

“Look closely. Water what is thirsty. Plant something.”

So the traveler clears the well. He waters a young tree. When a stranger comes by, he offers a drink. He plants the seed and gives it time.

He still has his seven books. He still has questions. And now there’s a little more life in the garden.

I can see myself in the traveler, eager to connect everything and understand how it all fits. The gardener gives me a useful reminder: there’s something right in front of me that could use my attention.

I’m curious about how light, water, and growth keep showing up in different teachings. There’s plenty more to understand in each one. For today, this little story gives me something simple to work with.

Offer a meal. Share a drink of water. Give someone a kind word. Take care of something and let it grow at its own pace.

That feels like a good place to begin.
